

Sarri Singer, born in Lakewood, New Jersey, is the daughter of New Jersey State Senator, Robert Singer and the victim of a horrific terrorist attack that took place in Jerusalem, Israel in 2003.

Until 9/11, Singer worked a few blocks from the World Trade Center, and she was deeply affected from the events of that day. As a result, Singer decided to resign from her job three months later, and move to Israel to help various organizations work with victims of terrorism. Unbeknownst to Singer, she would become a victim herself.

On June 11, 2003, Singer was on Bus 14 in Jerusalem when an 18-year-old Palestinian terrorist dressed as a religious Jew boarded the bus wearing an explosive device. Seventeen people were killed, including all those seated and standing around her, and over 100 people were injured - but Singer survived and her strength and story became headline news. Singer has appeared on CBS, Fox, CNN and radio, and she has spoken before Congress and Senate members in Washington, D.C., New York and New Jersey.

Singer is the founder of Strength to Strength, a non-profit organization which focuses on bringing together victims of terrorism from around the world and assisting them with long term psychological care. Singer continues to address audiences throughout the United States, Canada, Europe and Israel, most recently to Members of UK Parliament (2016), at The United Nations (2016), Congress for Victims of Terrorism (2011) in Paris, and at TerRa Conference (2014) in Brussels.
